Kindly let me know. Thanks A: This appears to be an issue with the way it is trying to load a resource.

I would take a look at the client you are calling. Here is a blog post about how to access the clients calling information: Q: do not allow the use of parentheses in asp.net membership I want to allow users to create accounts but i don't want them to put parenthesis around any of the input parameters of my asp:textbox, how can i make it so that if anyone enters parenthesis the parenthesis are removed from the string? (i don't want them to be there in the database but i'd prefer it if they're not there on the page at all i can manually find and strip them out before saving them to the database but is there a best practice way to do this? A: Try using Regex:

Regex.Replace(propertyValue, "[()]", ""); This invention relates to a DC type switching device, particularly for a low current consumption. For example, in a low current consumption transistor, as a switching device, an I.sup.2 L type transistor, a MOSFET, a BJT and the like are used. A capacitor or a Zener diode can be connected in parallel with the load in the MOSFET. When a transient current flows through a gate of the load, a supply voltage is applied to a gate of the switching device. However, a switching device of the above-mentioned DC type is small in switching loss, if the load is a low impedance load or a power source having a low impedance is connected to the load. For example, the I.sup.2 L type transistor has a switching loss of 10.sup.6 to 10.sup.7 and has a problem in that an excess loss is caused when a large current flows. On the other hand, a switching device of the same is not small in switching loss for a high current, if a large load is connected, because the large load operates as a capacitor. The switching device of the above-mentioned direct current type, which has a large switching loss, is not suitable for a large load. A switching device of the above-mentioned DC type is also small in switching loss for a low 1cdb3666d
