Players will now react to friendlies like they would an actual match, by only using the last pass, pass or shot they use. Players will also defend in a new, unique and reactionary way," says Dr. Alex Evans, Senior Lead gameplay engineer at EA SPORTS. "We call it reactive defending. For example, using simulations, we can see where players are going and predict where they're going to be. So before a player moves into the action, a defender uses a different strategy to where a player was going and intercepts a ball or tackles a player. This new defensive style combines with the new attacking style. It's always changing, like every moment in a football match, but there is still a human being in there." Players now lean into touches, attacks and shots by moving more when they are close to defenders and off-ball players. "This game play and feel were very much a result of the collaboration of many different departments and disciplines, including, visual artists, engineers and gameplay engineers. The end result is a very reactive experience that for the first time in football game play captures the live movement of players," says Evans. FIFA 22 also introduces a new ball physics technology called "Surface Intelligence," which gives the ball a more accurate and physics-based feeling on contact with the grass, dirt or artificial turf. The engine will also have new animations for aerial duels. Competition AI player intelligence, ball movement and context also continue to improve for additional playstyles. FIFA 22 introduces "Superstar Mode," which provides a bespoke Master Trainer who leads players through expert coaching sessions to improve their gameplay, which will help players to replicate a more realistic experience. Over time players will be able to complete challenges to unlock new attributes in Master Trainer mode. "Master Trainer Mode was created to respond to those things we know players crave in a training environment," says Evans. "Superstar Mode is another step in a new way of delivering experiences, where players really feel the character of the game." FIFA 22 also introduces the "Make-A-Move," which allows players to make their own free-kicks, corners or goals with new attributes that provide different style options. The enhanced version of the "Make-A-Move" will be integrated into FIFA Ultimate
