`# create a file with the extension `.rda` and change the name `test.rda``
`write.table(x, file = "test.rda", quote = FALSE, sep = "\t")` If you have the extension (.rda) then you can use the `writetable(x, file =...)` command. Otherwise you need to use `write.table(x, file =..., sep =..., quote =...)` If the file doesn't exist, it will create it.

Sub-solar metallicity star-forming galaxies in the local universe. One of the most striking properties of galaxies at high redshift is their tendency to have high stellar metallicities relative to the present-day. The origin of this trend has been elusive. While much theoretical work has addressed this question, observational support, in particular at low redshift, is sparse. To explore this connection, we have conducted a search for star-forming galaxies with subsolar metallicities in the local universe, where further studies can be more easily conducted. We present results for a sample of 886 extremely metal-poor (EMP) star-forming galaxies found in the Sloan Digital Sky Survey.

With our sample having a median stellar metallicity of $\sim 1\%$ solar ($12 + \log O/H = 7.73$), these local galaxies are some of the most metal-poor star-forming galaxies currently known. These galaxies populate environments from the relatively isolated, low-mass, Local Group galaxies to clusters of galaxies with a wide range of stellar masses, and include a few galaxies with the highest stellar metallicities yet known. Given their low masses and high gas fractions, these local galaxies exhibit systematically low gas-phase oxygen abundances in their interstellar mediums (ISM). We find that the oxygen abundance is related to the stellar metallicity (Z) through a simple linear relation, such that $\log O/H = \log Z + \text{constant}$. We also find a higher average metallicity in galaxies with the highest star formation rates. These results confirm the close relationship between galaxy metallicity and star
