Peptide immunoreactivity and radioautographic localization of CCK receptors in the intramural nervous system of the rat stomach.

Cholecystokinin (CCK) receptors have been identified in the intramural nervous system of the rat stomach by incubation of sections of stomach with ¹²⁵I-Bolton Hunter CCK-8 and analysis of the sections by the technique of regional in vitro autoradiography. CCK-8 produced high levels of specific radioactivity which were distributed over the entire intramural nervous system of the stomach. The pattern of distribution of specific CCK-8 binding was remarkably similar to that previously reported for CCK receptors in the vagal complex of the brain. In the stomach, binding was distributed throughout the myenteric plexus, including the entire length of the diffuse extrinsic and plexus of Auerbach, and was especially intense in the myenteric ganglia. Highest densities of binding were in the plexus of longitudinal muscle and circular muscle; however, binding was also present in the plexus of mucosa and submucosa. CCK-8 binding was also observed in the outer longitudinal muscle and was probably associated with the myenteric innervation of the arterioles, since binding was reduced or abolished after treatment with guanethidine. These findings suggest that the receptors detected are of the B type. The results of the in vitro autoradiographic analysis of specific CCK-8 binding were compared with those obtained by analysis of CCK-8-derived immunoreactivity. Binding sites and CCK immunoreactivity were virtually identical in the entire intramural nervous system. Furthermore, sections of stomach incubated with CCK-8 alone, without the addition of radiolabeled CCK-8, were processed for CCK immunohistochemistry and revealed strong reactions for both the CCK and the CCK-8-derived peptides in similar regions. The regional distribution of CCK-8-derived immunoreactivity in the intramural nervous system was very similar to that of the CCK binding sites. The results demonstrate the presence of functional CCK receptors in d0c515b9f4
