Whether it's logic puzzles like Sudoku or something more complicated, I find it fascinating and extremely fun to think my way around an enigma. The thing is, there are many different types of puzzles out there, some of them are very short, others can take several hours to solve, and sometimes they even end up taking days. Now, I didn't exactly decide to start making a puzzle game, but I ended up writing a very interesting side project that combines two of my favorite things – solving puzzles and graphics. I am calling the game One, Two, Three, and it is a turn based puzzle RPG. At the start of the game, you are on the bottom level, facing an empty field that you need to fill with a plant. As you proceed through the levels, the size of the field increases by one row, with each row having one more plant (there is also the option to start with an already completed level). This means that each level in the game is one step higher than the previous one, and the game ends once you are on the top level. But this isn't it! Each level also comes with a new set of obstacles, making the game all the more challenging. To play the game, you have to quickly identify plants by their shape, their color, and the fact that they are on the left, right, or below the direction you're currently moving. On top of that, you have to be quick to avoid falling off the field, or being hit by a speeding car, or by a pesky lobster. If you are at the top level, you also have to collect seeds scattered around, and plant them in the ground. You can find seeds on plants that you've already identified. If you manage to plant all the seeds, you get a seed totem that is vital in the game. b7e8fdf5c8
