In this study, the efficacy of a transdermal insulin delivery device (Transderm Insulatrade system) for improving glucose control in diabetic patients was evaluated. The efficacy of transdermal insulin treatment was also compared with subcutaneous injection of insulin. Two approaches were used in the studies: (1) a randomized, cross-over design, where the site and quantity of insulin applied were randomly assigned, and (2) a parallel study, where the site and quantity of insulin applied were the same in all subjects. The results show a high degree of individual variations in bioavailability between patients using the same amount of insulin applied at the same site. Better control with the device was mainly seen in subjects with a baseline glycosylated hemoglobin (HbA(1c)) level >10.5%. An additional insulin was effective in reducing average HbA(
